

Lieut.-Col. Everson of Norwood, Ohio, is a real fighting parson. His congregation gave him a leave of absence to go to war. He went and came back, with a fine service record, in command of the 33d Infantry that fought in Italy, arriving on the Canopic recently.

Copyright, Underwood & Underwood.

The guns of glory. A view of the upper west side of New York from under the forward turret guns of the superdreadnought Pennsylvania. Doesn't this suggest grim power at its highest point?

Copyright, Underwood & Underwood.

Ruth St. Denis with her pet and tame peacock form pulchritudinous additions to a scene that possesses great natural beauty already. It is at the dancer's garden at Denis Lawn, Los Angeles, Cal.

Photo, Press Illustrating Service.

The gobs on the dreadnought New York, now up the Hudson, call this the canine "shimmy." Whenever one of them starts a tune on any old kind of a musical instrument, Prince, the ship's mascot, gets up on his hind legs and starts to shuffle about in the latest jazz fashion.

Copyright, Underwood & Underwood.

So many of England's war veterans wanted to enter the ministry when the fighting was done that there wasn't room for all in the regular schools. Therefore, Knutford Gaol was converted into a training centre for the candidates, some of whom are shown here.

Photo, Western Newspaper Union.

Great interest was excited in London recently by a beauty contest, a common enough thing over here, but a rarity in England apparently. These four contestants had tea together before the judging, and got along very amicably, despite the issue at stake.

Copyright, Underwood & Underwood.